Road Program Gets Pick-up

RICHMOND- About 16 miles of new interstate highway, including onni-third of the Capital Beltway in Fairfax County, is expected to open for traffic before January 1, the State Highway Department reported today.

The Department said the new sections of Interstate Route 495 and 66 in Fairfax and Prince William Counties will give Virginia about 193 miles of highway built to full interstate standards and open to traffic.

With another 202 miles that are under construction, the state has about 30 per cent of the huge, billion-dollar interstate program completed or in the contract stage.

The new portions will be the first interstate highways to open in northern Virginia and will be on two routes that are expected to carry some of the heaviest traffic volumes in the 1,053 mile system.

Highway Commissioner H. H. Harris, said it is hoped the new sections will be of great benefit to the area and that they will give motorists some idea as to the benefits they may expect from travel on these high-speed, controlled-access and divided highways.

A section of about seven miles on the Capital Beltway (Interstate 495) between Shirley Highway (US Route 350) at Springfield and US Route 50 (Arlington Boulevard) may be opened to traffic about December 25.

This would be the first portion of the 64-mile Washington circumferential highway to carry traffic. Virginia is building 21 miles of the Beltway, with completion expected in 1963.

Construction of the seven-mile segment, including the interchange at Shirley Highway, cost about 13 million dollars. Contracts on the entire Beltway are now awarded at more than 37 million dollars.

No firm date has been set for the opening of an 8.5 mile section of Interstate 66 between Gainesville in Price William County and Centreville in Fairfax County. Engineers said, however, that there was a good chance of getting two-way signals and incidental work completed this month. Estimated cost of construction is $4,700,000.

Interstate 66 will eventually be a 76-mile highway linking Washington and Interstate 81 near Strasburg in Shenandoah County.

Access to the 8.5 mile section will be from US Routes 29-211 at both ends of the project.

A short section of less than one-half mile on the Beltway between US Route 1 and the new Woodrow Wilson Memorial Bridge at Alexandria will be opened to traffic with the dedication of the bridge on December 28, the anniversary of Wilson's birth.

The bridge, one of two Potomac River spans on the Beltway, was a Bureau of Public Roads project and will be maintained by Maryland.

Elsewhere on the Virginia interstate scene there were 90 miles of Interstate 95 in construction between Washington and the North Carolina border; work was in progress on more than 80 miles of Interstate 81 in the west and southwest another 12 miles were underway on. Interstate 66 in northern Virginia and construction was beginning on a section of Interstate 64 in Alleghany County.

Lions Club Honors Team; Merrick Speaks

U. of R. Coach Ed Merrick

Thirty members of the A. H. S. football squad and their popular coach, Gordon H. Bragg, were honored last evening at the annual "football banquet" of the Appomattox Lions Club. With forty Lions Club members present, the total attendance was seventy.

Featured speaker for the occasion was Edward J. Merrick, head football coach at the University of Richmond, the "Spider Mentor" was in all-ar form, and pleased his absolute audience with many humorous football stories, but yet added in sage advice to the high school youth. He stressed the fact that scholarship is a major item in a career of a high school athlete. College football coaches are constantly based on the grades and in classes, and it is important that the very freshman year in high school students seek to build up a good scholarship record. To wait until the junior year is too late.

Coach Merrick has had a fine record as an University of Richmond. A native of Pennsylvania, he came to Richmond, and was honored as one of the outstanding centers in the school's athletic records. As a coach he has kept the U. of R. highly respected as a well-coached team. This year, his team won over U. of W. Va., lost fairly closely to Army. The Spiders also lost to Alabama, but so did everyone else, as Alabama ended up as the nation's No. 1 team.

The entire occasion last night was a successful one, and it provided the best Lions Club with the opportunity to recognize and honor the football squad and coach at A. H. S.
